Our team is in agreement that a user story is defined as and can be presented as “Accepted” when it is approved through:

1. Peer Review of code
 - a. Each member of the team will review the code related to a user story and must give approval.
2. Demonstration
 - a. The implemented user story must be demoed to show the team that it functions as intended. Each member must give approval.
3. Integration
 - a. A user story can be officially accepted when it can be shown that it functions correctly when integrated with other team members’ code. If this is not the case, the team must work together to discover and correct integration errors.

Failure to meet these Requirements results in the need for the reviewed user story to be revised and corrected by the team. When the team believes the user story is finished the process can be repeated in order to earn the title of an “Accepted” user story.
